THE TRUTH ABOUT MISINFORMATION

To not admit your mistake is always a far greater mistake! It speaks to a lack of moral character and a fundamental dishonesty. Case in point: the Republican Party's impeachment inquiry into President Biden.

On June 8, 2023, Fox News reported, "Joe Biden allegedly paid $5M by Burisma executive as part of a bribery scheme, according to FBI document." Eight months later a very different headline appeared on the Fox website: "FBI informant who lied about Bidens' ties to Ukrainian energy company had high-level Russian contacts."

Alexander Smirnov, the FBI informant, had falsely informed agents that the Ukrainian energy company Burisma had bribed Joe and Hunter Biden with $5 million each during Obama's presidency. Smirnov has now been indicted on these outright lies.

So why is this turn of events so important? Because last summer Republicans piled onto this lie so wholeheartedly that they used it as the basis for their impeachment inquiry into President Biden. And now that they know, without a doubt, that the basis for their probe is false—in fact, that this misinformation was likely propagated by Russian intelligence—they are continuing their bullheaded inquiry unfazed.

The GOP-led impeachment effort has produced hours upon hours of testimony and more than 100,000 pages of documents. Yet they have been unable to prove a single wrongdoing by President Biden. Now the very underpinnings of their inquiry have crumbled, and if a vote to impeach came to the House floor, it would certainly be defeated. So why continue this lie?

No doubt their plan is to drag this charade into the general election in the hopes that it will fuel doubts about the President's honesty. But the GOP has clearly lost its way and is no longer able to distinguish between truth and falsehood…or, more likely, simply doesn't want to. Their only concern now is doing absolutely anything to help their Liar in Chief, Donald Trump, back into the White House. Truth be damned. How's that for integrity?

MITCH McCONNELL

In the heated buildup to November, there has been a lot of chatter about the age of our Presidential candidates: How old is too old? Republicans allege, and even many Democrats worry, that Joe Biden may be coasting along past his expiration date. Donald Trump is certainly no spring chicken, and regardless of his alleged physical health, his brains turned into scrambled eggs years ago. The same concern applies to the longest-serving party leader of the Senate: the odious Republican Mitch McConnell, 82, who acts more like a resurrected cadaver with every passing day.

Back in July of last year, McConnell was speaking at a press conference when he suddenly froze like a deer in the headlights, unable to utter a word or make any movement. Senator Barrasso had to escort him from the lectern. Mitch did it again in August, completely catatonic, looking exactly like a doddering Alzheimer's patient in the final days. U.S. Capitol attending physician Brian Monahan assured the nation that the embarrassing episodes were due to the lingering effects from a concussion McConnell suffered way back in March, plus lightheadedness and dehydration. But many fellow Republicans were not buying it. "You can't say that you're concerned about Joe Biden, but you're not concerned about Mitch McConnell," said Josh Hawley. His fellow GOP senator from Kentucky, Rand Paul, M.D., said, "From what I've seen, it's a neurological event; it's not dehydration." And then the arch-conservative rag National Review chimed in: "The time has come for the Kentucky senator, after his long, impressive run, to make the decision to step aside from leadership."

We heartily agree—and finally, finally, so does he! In late February McConnell announced that he would step down as leader of the Senate this year—and not a minute too soon, because his "long run" has been impressively malignant, a multi-decade shit show. He's been squatting in the Senate since the dark ages of Reagan's White House—since 1985 to be exact, racking up a record as the greatest double-dealing, hypocritical obstructionist of all time. As the figurehead of our evolving plutocracy—with his multiple terms as either Senate Majority or Minority Leader—he has led the battle against campaign finance reform and voting rights legislation and let the fat cats run amok, the 99% be damned. After Georgia enacted draconian new laws restricting voting access in 2021, and Major League Baseball along with some corporations (Coca-Cola and Delta Air Lines) objected to this blatantly racist program, Mitch had the gall to say, "If I were running a major corporation, I'd stay out of politics." What a howler! Democratic Senator from Maryland Chris Van Hollen nailed it: "He has no problem with all of them [corporations] weighing in in support of the Trump tax cuts. He has no problem with them weighing in with laws to discourage unions. When they weigh in on behalf of voters, that crosses a line."

Another line that McConnell will never cross: voting against any and all tax cuts for the ultrarich, like himself. The Economic Times estimated his personal net worth to be approximately $35 million. So he's always voting shamelessly to pad his own fortune. To get the CARES (Coronavirus Aid, Relief and Economic Security) Act passed in 2020, McConnell insisted on adding a $135 billion tax break for 43,000 of the wealthiest Americans—almost 68 times the paltry $2 billion that over 4 million average Kentuckians collectively received. One of McConnell's constituents slammed that unnecessary giveaway in a letter to the editor of Georgetown's News-Graphic: "It's like McConnell is a reverse socialist."

Mitch the Billionaires' Bitch will always be remembered for roadblocking everything President Obama tried to accomplish, stating in 2010 that his focus would be making Obama a "one-term President." This meant sabotaging everything indiscriminately, including Obama's judicial nominations—like Merrick Garland for Supreme Court while Obama still had a full ten months in office. But with less than two months left before the 2020 election, Mitch the Hypocrite rushed through the approval process for conservative SCOTUS nominee Amy Coney Barrett. Once Biden was in office, Mitch repeated his mission statement from 2010: "One-hundred percent of our focus is on stopping this new administration" that wants to "turn America into a socialist country."

When congressional Democrats got fed up with Mitch and his GOP troopers using the filibuster to stymie Biden's legislative agenda and threatened to abolish it, Mitch complained that "the Senate would be more like a 100-car pileup, nothing moving." Comedian Stephen Colbert answered best: "It's already happening, you idiot, and the filibuster is why it's happening." But you better believe that if Democrats were a minority in the Senate, he would be singing a far different tune.

Nothing demonstrates McConnell's jowly Janus-faced hypocrisy like his relationship with Trump. After the insurrection on January 6, 2021, McConnell publicly condemned the 45th President for it, but then voted against impeaching him, using the excuse that the trial came too late, after Trump was out of office and "constitutionally not eligible for conviction." But it was McConnell himself who kept the Senate out of commission for the last weeks of Trump's term. He ran out the clock, then complained there was not enough time to do anything.

According to a new biography about Mitt Romney, Mitch confided to Romney that he was "lucky": "You're in a position to say things about him [Trump] that we all agree with but can't say." Romney further recalled McConnell stating, "He's [Trump's] an idiot. He doesn't think when he says things." But you can be sure that once Trump wins the nomination—a near certainty now—Mitch will be first in line to plant a long, sloppy kiss on the Orange Buffoon's big butt.

Speaking of kissing ass, Mitch can't stop servicing the bloated military-industrial complex. In 1986, when he had been in office only one year, defense contractors were exposed for charging $640 for toilet seats and $7,622 for a coffee maker. Since then, like clockwork, similar outrageous gouging has come to light as the Defense Department, alone among government entities, has never passed an audit. In 2022, defense contractor TransDigm's founder Nick Howley was called to testify before Congress over allegations of price gouging when a review found that TransDigm was charging $119 million for parts that cost $28 million—just the tip of the fraud iceberg, according to a report by 60 Minutes. Presidents come and go, but in the near 40 years that McConnell has been in power, has he ever lifted one finger to stop this perennial heist? Nope. Instead, he has greased the wheels for every bloated Pentagon budget and every military intervention abroad without exception, no matter how ill-advised. And he has resisted any congressional attempts to rescind the 2002 AUMF (Authorization for Use of Military Force) that has enabled our endless series of wars in the Middle East.

As Israel continued its relentless campaign against Hamas in Gaza and nearly 15,000 Palestinians had been killed—including 5,000 children—Mitch declared that Israel was exempt from the same conditions we require for military aid to other nations. "I think it's ridiculous," McConnell told reporters in November, adding that because Israel has a close national security relationship with the U.S., holding them to our standards was "totally unnecessary."

Like a true warmonger, McConnell has fomented the worst war of all: Americans against Americans. Our country is locked in hyperpartisan combat, where compromise is considered betrayal and viable solutions are sabotaged to make the other party, "the enemy," look bad. Anything goes, rules be damned, and we can thank this degenerate old patriarch for paving the way. The ancient, turtle-faced Asshole has done damage to everyone but his fellow plutocrats. We can't believe Mitch still intends to serve out his term as Senator, but thank fucking God he will no longer be the Senate Republican Leader. H

IRREVERENT

ELLEN STAGG

I'm irreverent, and I really don't give a shit. I refuse to be in a relationship with any man who attempts to tell me what to do—I would rather take someone's money and burn it than submit to their authority. I do what I want to do, and if that means that I miss out on a carrot someone is offering me, I don't give a fuck. One of my proudest moments was when I left my very rich boyfriend to live life by myself, with no financial help.

"I get turned on by skinny boys with lots of tattoos. And I like men who can do masculine things—if I have to be the one to change a tire, that's a big turn-off. Oh, and I prefer a guy with a big dick, something that can bruise my cervix. Girth and length—you have to have both.

"One of my best sexual experiences was with a long-term boyfriend and his best friend. That was cool. It was more than just physical. I was in love with both of them, and they were in love with each other. Another time I was visiting a college friend years after we graduated. He had bought a house with his fiancée, and we fucked in the guest room while she was asleep in the master bedroom. That was crazy."

MiPorn

THE FBI, THE MOB & XXX

ARTICLE BY COLIN McCRACKEN
ILLUSTRATIONS BY ALEX GAMSU JENKINS

For every undercover government agent, there comes a time when it's clear that the jig is up. For Pat Salamone that moment came in 1978, when gangsters drove him out to the Florida Everglades, put a gun to his head and made him start digging his own grave. Salamone had been investigating connections between the porn industry and the Italian mob as part of the most radical and dangerous operation the FBI had ever instigated. Now it seemed his mission was about to come to an abrupt and violent end. This is the story of Operation MiPorn.

Before he became Pat Salamone, he was Pat Livingston, a bright-eyed and enthusiastic file clerk who joined the FBI in 1964. A staunch believer in truth, liberty and the American way, he had a likable character and was good at talking out of his ass when he had to. This made him perfect undercover material. Seven years later, after months of intensive federal training, Livingston became a special agent. He was transferred to Detroit with his wife Vicki, where they met another young couple, Bruce and Pam Ellavsky. The four became neighbors as well as firm friends, and their lives would be intertwined from that moment on as Operation MiPorn threw the agents into an undercover nightmare from which they never truly escaped.

> Representatives from all the major crime families had a presence, and everyone wanted the biggest slice of the pie.

Livingston's rare ability to go unnoticed while undercover brought him a string of successful missions in those early days at the Bureau. He spied on Jane Fonda as she gave anti-Vietnam speeches in '72. He investigated KKK-inspired school bus bombings and an incident in which a principal was tarred and feathered. He was damn good at his job, and it didn't go unnoticed by his superiors, who moved Livingston to the hijacking and major thefts division. Here he made a huge sting in '75, when he sourced thousands of stolen cases of beer.

Next up was the Tigertown stolen goods investigation, in which Livingston was arrested while working undercover. This could have been a disaster, as a detained FBI agent can rarely declare his status for fear of jeopardizing the mission. Livingston managed to talk his way out of a charge, saving the entire project. He had an astute gift of gab, a confident and smooth kind of guy who could forcibly negotiate deals and make people around him feel at ease. The Tigertown bust made him a hotshot on the force, and his bosses had something huge lined up for him.

The FBI offices in Miami were teeming with activity in '77, when Livingston moved down there with his family. Smuggling, extortion, dealing, terrorist fears, prostitution and organized crime were rife in the Sunshine State. The Feds certainly had their hands full. Florida in the '70s was one of the only regions in the U.S. in which representatives from all the major crime families had a presence, and everyone wanted the biggest slice of the pie.

The porn industry was booming. A radical outburst of sexual expression and revolution had resulted in pornography's expansive growth, and it terrified the powers that be. What pissed the conservatives off even more was learning how much money it generated. Adult bookstores and peep show booths littered the country, no longer limited to the sleazy hub that was Times Square. Their trade was legal, and therefore hard to bust, but the FBI had been keeping a close eye on the entire industry since the early '60s. They knew that mob money was involved. They just couldn't prove it. Links had been established, but nothing solid had been unearthed. Something needed to be done.

It was around this time that William Kelly, an FBI agent who had been waging a one-man war against pornography, helped establish an operation. Kelly was constantly making small-time arrests (bookstore clerks, minor porno dealers) and taking them up on obscenity charges, very few of which ever stuck. They needed to go after the bigger fish, and they needed a foolproof way to hook them.

He presented a proposal to his FBI superiors, who knew they had one man who was perfect for the job, Pat Livingston. If anyone could get in deep with the mob, it was him. A proposal was drafted, and Livingston immediately accepted, asking for $25,000 to make some initial porn purchases. He also requested a partner. He wanted his best friend, Bruce Ellavsky, and he got him. "I just felt comfortable with [Bruce] from the get-go," Livingston told Legs McNeil, one of the founders of Punk magazine, in an archive interview. "I knew I could trust him. When you're out there undercover, you got to protect each other. You have to know exactly what the other guy is thinking. I was comfortable Bruce could do that."

> The two clean-cut FBI agents soon became addicted to the glamour that came with their new identities.

The operation was named MiPorn (Miami Pornography) and was initially supposed to last six months, targeting the suspected funding of the porn industry by La Cosa Nostra ("Our Thing," the name given to the Sicilian Mafia). Ellavsky and Livingston would pose as wholesalers and producers in an attempt to infiltrate the criminal element that provided the money and racketeering the FBI believed existed within the industry. It ended up going on for several years, destroying families, careers and psyches. Once they got in deep, Livingston lost his mind.

On a technical note, MiPorn operated under two precedents: one, to discover pornographic materials being transported across state lines and, two, to uncover criminal conspiracies as defined by the RICO (Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations) statutes. Basically, if they couldn't nail the mobsters for the porn, they'd get them for tax evasion. Hell, it worked for Al Capone.

It was Agent William Kelly's job to train them as pornographers. He gave them tips such as never buy a tape for $60 that they could get for $40 wholesale and never to ask for child porn straightaway. If they did, they'd blow their cover immediately. Livingston was also presented with some of the "tools of the trade," including a double-dong dildo. It took some explanation on Kelly's part before Livingston could even figure out how it worked. He was that innocent. It wouldn't take long, however, before his innocence would disappear without a trace.

Livingston and Ellavsky were being sent after two of the biggest mobsters in America: Mickey Zaffarano and Robert DiBernardo. These notorious individuals had a reputation for making money and making people disappear. Zaffarano owned several porn theaters in Manhattan and handled the distribution of XXX flicks for the Bonanno crime family (one of the five major New York Mafia families). He was one of the moneymen behind Debbie Does Dallas and, in many ways, a maverick gangster. A lot of the old-timers wouldn't deal in porn, whereas he saw it as a cash cow just waiting to be milked. DiBernardo was an associate of John Gotti's and had helped finance the publication of Screw magazine for Al Goldstein, along with other shadier deals.

Pat Livingston was a short, well-built guy who transformed himself into an archetypal sleazebag with worrying ease. He grew a goatee and wore slick suits, including a sharkskin number he was particularly proud of. The FBI created a falsified criminal record for him and threw him and Ellavsky—now going by the name of Bruce Wakerly—right in at the deep end. They now had to act with the swagger and flair of the mobsters they would be rubbing shoulders with. All connections to their past were severed and their marriages suffered. As loyal and loving as their wives were, they couldn't withstand the lengthy stints away, let alone the drinking and casual sex that came with the playboy lifestyles Ellavsky and Livingston had adopted. The two clean-cut FBI agents soon became addicted to the glamour that came with their new identities.

"You should be acting rather than becoming, and during the operation Pat started to become his undercover persona," Ellavsky told McNeil. "Actually, becoming is much easier, because if you become that person, you won't screw up."

The MiPorn pair had no backup, no weaponry and no support. They had nothing but their wits and their backstories to keep them alive, and so every trace of their past had to be forgotten when they were on the job. Livingston, however, took this literally.

They dined in the finest Miami restaurants and drank in the most infamous haunts of the underworld kings. It was important to be flashy and extravagant—all at the taxpayer's expense, of course. Livingston and Ellavsky tried to gain attention by shifting goods such as designer jeans, which they would use to tip waitresses (a $100 pair of Jordaches being pretty strong currency in '78). They were the new kids in town, with a lot of dough and merchandise to throw around. That got people talking.

With the help of an attorney friend named Bill Brown, they set up a company named Golde Coaste Specialties and a bank account in the Cayman Islands. Now they had an explanation for all the porn they had been buying from the local distributors. They could launder it through the Cayman accounts without raising too many suspicions. They traveled to the islands, where Livingston told the first taxi driver they met to "Take us to the girls." Brown recalls how they all retired to their rooms that night with the finest teenage beauties the clubs had to offer.

As a result of their extroverted decadence, their reputations grew, and this granted them audiences with mob-affiliated pornographers that the FBI had been investigating for years. They also managed to secure an invite to one of the biggest porn meet-ups in the country, the New Orleans XXX convention, in April '78. It was here where they became involved with Star Distributors and Ruby Gottesman. A veteran pornographer, Gottesman had his own methods of checking up on the pair. At the time he was acting as a sugar daddy for porn star Rhonda Jo Petty, having offered her protection after her father threatened to kill her. Gottesman sent Petty to "service" Livingston and Ellavsky. The only report she returned with was that she took them to their rooms and blew them both, adding that they came pretty quick. She couldn't see guns, files or anything else that would make her think they were cops. This was good enough for Gottesman, who would vouch for them from here on in.

They threw Livingston a shovel and told him to start digging. The mobsters said they knew he was a snitch.

Through Gottesman, they got a direct link to Robert DiBernardo, one of the primary targets. Livingston and Ellavsky were told in no uncertain terms that if they messed with DB, as he was affectionately known, they'd be buried. After a few meetings, Livingston and one of DiBernardo's associates were arrested in the FBI-leased pink Cadillac that Livingston drove. They had a trunk full of porn loops, but the cops thought it was a drug deal taking place. DiBernardo's associate was certain that he'd been stitched up, but with the help of Livingston's lawyer friend Bill Brown, they were released and the situation was diffused.

A meeting with DiBernardo was finally arranged, and Livingston went to the Bridge Restaurant for a sit-down to discuss potential deals. When Livingston strutted cockily into the kitchen to pay his regards to the head chef, he was greeted by two men he didn't know. They were armed and ushered him into their car. Through the Florida night they drove west, past Fort Lauderdale and down an isolated dirt road. Pulling the car over and dragging him out into the darkness, they threw Livingston a shovel and told him to start digging.

The mobsters said they knew he was a snitch and were going to put an end to him. Livingston had to think fast, but he started digging. He knew he couldn't cry for help, or beg, but by now he had dug to calf level, almost enough for a shallow grave. Time was running out, so he did what he knew best and acted like a mobster. He told the men that if they killed him, they'd be making a huge mistake and were as good as dead if they did so.

It took some work, but he weaseled his way out of it. Livingston held his ground and, as a result, was brought back to the restaurant. He then had to make it through the dinner without throwing up all over the table. DiBernardo later assured Livingston that he just wanted to see how he'd cope with the pressure of it all. This was the ultimate hazing, but it paid off. They now had the big fish on the line.

Problems were developing in the MiPorn team. It had been a two-year job, and the rivalry between Livingston and Ellavsky was increasing. By '79, Ellavsky's wife Pam was leaving him. The operation had gone on too long, and she was ready to walk. Ellavsky also had a full-time girlfriend, who he wanted to tell the whole undercover story to, a move that could spell death and disaster. This really put Livingston on edge.

Ellavsky was getting paranoid about Livingston's increasingly erratic behavior and began spending more time with his new girl. When a meeting was set up with Al Nunes, a scumbag dealer who traded in the roughest porn imaginable, Livingston was sent on his own to meet him in Hawaii. This turned out to be one of the most challenging encounters of the whole operation, but the most successful in terms of moving the case forward. Nunes specialized in child pornography, which he reportedly sold a great deal of to the Army bases nearby, and Livingston managed to get him to agree to a deal. He recalls how disgusting it was, having to watch the material Nunes presented, especially when he had children the same age, but he stayed in character and just discussed how hot the scenes were. Nunes made the sale. That nailed it.

They had almost all the intel they needed to make a series of arrests. They had enough to convict Robert DiBernardo. Now all they needed was Mickey Zaffarano, and the job was done. In a ridiculously dangerous encounter, Livingston traveled to New York and simply knocked on Zaffarano's door. He said that he was about to do a deal to sell Debbie Does Dallas with one of the mobster's alleged associates, Joe Arieno (aka Joe Black) and could he vouch for him. Zaffarano said that Joe was "all right." The connection was made. That was all they needed to make a case. Livingston forgot himself, subsequently pushing for more info, and almost blew it. He was chased out of the building, fearing for his life.

Fifty-five indictments were set up across ten cities. Four hundred FBI agents made the arrests. When the bust came, Zaffarano tried to evade capture by running through the hidden tunnels and alleys that connected his grindhouse theaters and bookstores. The stress was too much, and he dropped dead of a heart attack before they could apprehend him.

The case was locked. They had almost every major figure in the porno business set to go to trial. MiPorn was wrapped, but there was something wrong with Livingston. After the operation, his behavior became almost uncontrollable. He was confrontational, obnoxious and couldn't settle back into the nine-to-five working life of an agent. In a last-ditch attempt to save his tattered marriage, he transferred to Kentucky, where his wife was from, and within a few months persuaded his new employers to send him undercover again.

In 1981, Livingston was arrested in a department store for shoplifting $157 worth of designer clothing. For some reason he identified himself as Pat Salamone when he was detained. By the time of his arrest, he barely knew he was Livingston anymore. He had been acting like a criminal for so long, it was now second nature.

The explanation was simple: Livingston had been sent undercover with no psychological support for years, and he cracked. The outcome of this incident pretty much destroyed a decade-long investigation. Upon hearing of the news of his son's arrest, Livingston's father had a series of heart attacks and died days later.

One of the key, unspoken rules of the FBI is, "Don't embarrass the Bureau." Livingston had done just that, and as a result, they threw him under the bus. His arrest and prosecution were made public, and he was discredited as a witness in the MiPorn trials. This was the devastating part, as it meant all of his testimonies were ruled null and void. The press exposure also put his life greatly at risk. The Bureau didn't care. He'd messed up and they washed their hands of him. Only Ellavsky's evidence could be counted in the proceedings. This resulted in several key suspects walking away from the prosecution without charge. They were willing to let members of the Mafia go free just so they could make an example out of Livingston. Such is the hypocrisy of the system. Following MiPorn, the FBI changed the rules regarding undercover work, stating that agents could only go undercover for a maximum of six months and would be subject to regular psychological tests.

Livingston would go on to tell his story to Ron LaBrecque, who wrote the book Lost Undercover in 1987 as well as Legs McNeil, Jennifer Osborne and Peter Pavia for The Other Hollywood (2006). He also appeared in the Channel 4 (U.K.) documentary The Dark Side of Porn: Debbie Does Dallas Uncovered (2005). Living in Orlando, Livingston's wild days are behind him, and he now enjoys life as a golf pro. He never returned to the Bureau.

When asked what happened to his alter ego, Livingston simply replied, "Pat Salamone is still there." H

Oh Hey

My sex drive is off the charts. Seriously, if I go a few hours without, I start to feel like I'm going crazy. And when I'm really horny, I'm practically feral! In my free time, I like to add to my record collection—if there's anything I like as much as a pretty penis, it's cool vinyl. But my favorite hobby? Playing with my pussy and getting myself off. I love flicking my bean!" —Sera

I was a bit of a hell-raiser, growing up—in school, I was always the one who had to question everything. Even so, I got really good grades. I still have that spirit and drive, and I think it's helped me a lot in my porn career. Of course, I also owe my success to my loyal fans, and I love every one of you with my entire heart. I get such a thrill performing for you and knowing that, when you see me naked, I'm raising something besides hell!" —Kimora

I need a man who is willing to put his mouth where my money is," moans Hungarian hottie Angel Kiss. "I'm talking about my juicy pussy. Has Angel ever had a girl kiss her down there? "Of course!" she exclaims. "But it's not the same. A woman is all soft and gentle. The feel of a man's rough, stubbly chin scraping against my inner thigh is the ticket. That's part of the turn-on. Don't get me wrong: I love getting it on with girls, but nothing beats a man. Growing up, I was a wild child, always on the lookout for an adventure and very curious. Constantly on the move, finding new ways to make money—lemonade stands, yard sales, lawn care for neighbors and singing at the hotel close to my childhood home. I never could take no for an answer, which led to good and bad things. I carry with me those same characteristics to this day. I love to travel the world, and I'm still so curious and a go-getter, doing whatever it takes to achieve my dreams.

"I love remodeling and working with my hands. I love to sing and share my voice—to make people feel something. And I love to go to raves and dance my heart out!

"Both men and women do it for me, and I've tried almost everything. But what I like best turns out to be vanilla sex with a little bit of spice, like slapping my ass or light choking and lip-biting. There are still a couple fantasies I haven't fulfilled, like having sex with two men at the same time. I don't even know if I could handle it, but I'd sure like to try!"

IS ANYONE OUT THERE?

AN INTERVIEW WITH PROFESSOR AVI LOEB ON UNIDENTIFIED ANOMALOUS PHENOMENA*

(*UAPs, FORMERLY KNOWN AS UFOs)

BY ED RAMPELL

"FOR DECADES, MANY AMERICANS HAVE BEEN FASCINATED BY OBJECTS MYSTERIOUS AND UNEXPLAINED, AND IT'S LONG PAST TIME THEY GET SOME ANSWERS. THE AMERICAN PUBLIC HAS A RIGHT TO LEARN ABOUT TECHNOLOGIES OF UNKNOWN ORIGINS, NONHUMAN INTELLIGENCE AND UNEXPLAINABLE PHENOMENA."
—Senate Majority Leader Chuck Schumer

It wasn't some wild-eyed true believer in flying saucers and little green men who made the above statement—rather, it was U.S. Senate Majority Leader Chuck Schumer last July, when he coauthored, with other senators, the Unidentified Anomalous Phenomena (UAP) Disclosure Act of 2023 as an amendment to the National Defense Authorization Act. Schumer's statement and the proposed measure aim to provide greater transparency to UFO-related matters and exemplified the fact that high-level members of the government, military, intelligence and academia are increasingly taking unidentified flying objects seriously. The Hill describes this process as a "seismic shift in the government's official stance on UFOs."

The same month as Schumer's assertion, the House Committee on Oversight and Accountability's Subcommittee on National Security, the Border and Foreign Affairs held a hearing on "Unidentified Anomalous Phenomena: Implications on National Security, Public Safety and Government Transparency." At this eyebrow-raising July 26, 2023, congressional session, three military veterans testified, under oath and penalty of perjury, about their experiences regarding what may be extraterrestrial crafts and even beings.

There have been other upper-echelon investigations of UAPs (yes, UFOs even have a new, more respectable-sounding moniker). Director of National Intelligence Avril Haines submitted reports in the 2020s to Congress about Unidentified Anomalous Phenomena. In May 2023, the Five Eyes intelligence partners held a UFO briefing presented by the director of the Pentagon's UFO research program. That same month, NASA presented its first public meeting on UFOs, a year after launching a study into unexplained sightings. The National Aeronautics and Space Administration followed suit in September with its "UAP Independent Team Study Report." And so on.

All of this high-ranking heightened interest in UAPs leaves us scratching our heads and asking, what the heck—if anything—is out there? And if space aliens do exist, are they coming here? To find out, HUSTLER asked a scientist who has been leading the research in this field.

Professor Avi Loeb is the theoretical astrophysicist The New York Times calls "the most famous practicing astronomer in the country." Loeb came to Harvard University in 1993 to study the stars and galaxies and now heads Harvard's Galileo Project, is founding director of the university's Black Hole Initiative and director of the Institute for Theory and Computation at the Harvard-Smithsonian Center for Astrophysics. He chairs the advisory board for the Breakthrough Starshot project, is a former member of the President's Council of Advisors on Science and Technology and ex-chair of the Board on Physics and Astronomy of the National Academies. In 2021, Loeb wrote Extraterrestrial: The First Sign of Intelligent Life Beyond Earth and coauthored the textbook Life in the Cosmos. In 2023 he penned Interstellar, and throughout his career he has published 1,000-plus scientific papers. Professor Loeb was interviewed by phone near Boston, and in this candid conversation, the space tracker discusses the recent upsurge in UFO investigations, his epic expedition to the bottom of the South Pacific Ocean, and his quest to document other worlds through scientific analysis.

SHAWN ALFF PHOTOGRAPHY BY APRIL ALSTON MCKAY

> “THE SKY’S NOT CLASSIFIED—WE DON’T NEED TO RELY ON GOVERNMENT TO TELL US IF THERE’S ANYTHING EXTRATERRESTRIAL VISITING EARTH.”

HUSTLER: Tell us about your background.
PROFESSOR AVI LOEB: I grew up on a farm in Israel and had to serve in the military. I pursued physics because it’s useful for the country’s defense. I was recruited for a program funded by “Star Wars,” President Reagan’s Strategic Defense Initiative, which allowed me to finish my Ph.D. That brought me to the U.S., where Princeton offered me a fellowship. Then I moved to Harvard and became the longest-serving chair of the astronomy department.

The Galileo Project was established a month after the Director of National Intelligence, Avril Haines, submitted a report in 2021 to Congress about UAPs, objects whose nature is unclear, and military and intelligence personnel can’t identify: Either they’re objects from adversarial countries that are in our sky and we don’t know how to interpret them, or they’re not human-made—some of these objects are from outside the solar system and arrived here from another civilization. That would be even more exciting.

National Intelligence Director Haines is an example of high-level government figures with interest in UAPs. What do you make of the July 2023 Congressional hearing on unidentified anomalous phenomena?
[The Haines report] was able to figure out and resolve about 97% of the cases before them and say they are known objects. There’s still a few percent they can’t figure out—that’s their conclusion so far.

The most interesting testimony in front of the House [in July 2023] was by David Grusch [who served as an intelligence officer in the U.S. Air Force, both active-duty Air National Guard and Reserve as a major, and at the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency]. He said the U.S. government has programs that have been going on for decades for retrieval and reverse-engineering of alien spacecraft that were recovered from crash sites. That includes biological material. He did not provide publicly the evidence; Grusch just says he spoke with 40 people within government.

I spoke with him by Zoom the other day. Grusch is not legally allowed to reveal the details. For me as a scientist, the truth is in the details. Since we haven’t seen the evidence, we can’t tell. As a scientist, I refrain from having an opinion on this until we see the evidence. This is very intriguing, but I’d really like to see the evidence!

That’s why I established the Galileo Project. We can wait for the government to do the right thing and release information, but the experience is that the government is not coming forward. The Schumer Amendment to disclose information through a board to advise the President was pretty much gutted in December 2023.

The sky’s not classified—we don’t need to rely on government to tell us if there’s anything extraterrestrial visiting Earth. We don’t need to wait for them. We can just survey the sky. So the Galileo Project has three branches. One is an observatory that we built at Harvard that is monitoring the sky 24/7, taking a video of the sky and also monitoring it with audio. You can think of it as taking a movie of the sky all the time. A computer program, software, is trying to make sense of the data. Are objects moving like birds, balloons, drones, aircraft—or is it something else? The Galileo Project is gathering our own data, engaged in a scientific study of the sky; it’s really the first [audiovisual] attempt to monitor the sky for a long period of time and analyze everything in it.

We’re making a copy of this system that we’ll assemble in Colorado [in 2024]. Each copy costs roughly $500,000, so depending on how much funding we get, we’ll put many of these observatories around the country. The goal is to figure out if there’s anything unusual flying in the sky. This is better than what the government is doing, which is based on anecdotal reports. You can’t rely on eyewitness testimony, because it isn’t scientific data.

At the same July 26, 2023, Congressional hearing, Retired Navy Commander David Fravor, head of the F/A-18F squadron on the USS Nimitz, testified about “a Tic Tac-looking object” with no markings, no wings and no exhaust plumes, descending 80,000 feet in less than a second. What do you make of this account and of various videos of rapidly moving Tic Tac-shaped objects?
Yeah, that’s intriguing, but these videos were not taken by cameras that were fully under control. It’s not scientific-quality data. It’s intriguing; it convinces me to get engaged. I cannot use the existing data that was made public—it’s not good enough to do a reliable scientific analysis.

Other scientists have an opinion, and they’re not seeking evidence. So I’m intrigued by these reports, I trust Fravor and [former F-18 Naval pilot] Ryan Graves. I met him, and he seems like a very reliable guy. If I had my instruments monitoring the sky at that time, I’d have the full data. Then I could tell you how unusual it is, if it’s something extraterrestrial. But it’s definitely very intriguing. There’s so much real estate out there.

Let’s discuss the evidence you’ve found using the scientific method. Tell us about what is called “’Oumuamua,” Hawaiian for “a messenger from afar arriving first.”
In October 2017, a telescope in Hawaii, Pan-STARRS, at an observatory purposed to find near-Earth objects that could impact the Earth, discovered an object near Earth moving very fast. Faster than the speed necessary to escape from the gravitational pull of the sun. So it was not bound to the solar system—it came from outside the solar system. That was the first report of such an object. It was the size of a football field. At first [it seemed to be] a big rock that came from another star. I was intrigued, because decades before that I wrote the first paper that predicted how many rocks of that size should be around from other stars.

It was surprising to me that they actually found one. If it’s a rock, there should be many more rocks out there. As more data came in on this rock, it looked really unusual, not like a typical rock we are familiar with, because the amount of sunlight reflected from it changed by a factor of ten, as it was tumbling, every eight hours. The best fit to the variation of light was that of a flat object, pancake-like. That is quite unusual. Then the object exhibited some push away from the sun, some additional acceleration beyond the gravitational acceleration the sun uses. So the question was, what is pushing it?

One simple possibility is the “rocket effect”—gas evaporates from the object, pushing it in the opposite direction, like a rocket. That happens for comets. But when the space telescope looked very deeply for any gas, it didn't find any; there wasn't any trace of evaporation. So then the question was, what is really pushing it? There was this nongravitational push.

THE MILKY WAY, CAPTURED BY THE HUBBLE SPACE TELESCOPE

I suggested it was the reflection of sunlight pushing it, and for that the object had to be very thin—like a sail, or a surface layer that was ripped apart from something else. Or a broken piece of a bigger object. Nature doesn't make very thin objects like a sail; therefore, it may be artificial in origin. So that's what drew me to the subject of the possibility that we might have an object that was manufactured by a civilization in the solar system ["a solar sail from an interstellar craft, using sunlight to accelerate through space," as Loeb hypothesized in The Guardian].

Tell us about the interstellar meteor.
So then, with my students, we discovered a meteor the size of a watermelon that collided with Earth on January 8, 2014. According to data from a U.S. government satellite, it was moving very fast; it was not bound to the sun. This was actually the first interstellar meteor, an object that came from outside the solar system. It was moving faster than 95% of the stars in the vicinity of the sun, we concluded. The name of the meteor is "IM1," or "Interstellar Meteor 1," labeling it as a candidate for the first large interstellar object discovered by humans.

A few years after we submitted a report about that, in an official letter to NASA, the U.S. Space Command confirmed they looked back at the data and confirmed that, indeed, this meteor was from outside the solar system; it's an interstellar meteor. This means it's the first interstellar object, before 'Oumuamua. After this confirmation, they released the light that was generated by this meteor burning up in the atmosphere when it exploded. It released 2% of the Hiroshima bomb energy…it was actually exposed to an immense stress before it disintegrated. We concluded it was tougher than iron meteorites, tougher than all 272 space rocks catalogued by NASA over the decades.

This raised the possibility in my mind, if it's moving so fast and made of material-strength that's tougher than iron, perhaps it's a Voyager-type meteor. Imagine our own spacecraft Voyager that will exit the solar system; eventually, it may collide with a faraway planet like Earth. Then it would appear like a meteor of unusual material-strength because it is made of artificial alloy, and it would be very fast because it was propelled by chemical rockets. ["That's what led me originally to suspect maybe it's a spacecraft," Loeb told The Guardian.]

To find out, I led an expedition to the South Pacific Ocean, to the meteor site. It was funded at $1.5 million [by donors]. I assembled 28 of the best people in the world for navigation, engineering, machinery, etc. The idea was to go after the molten droplets from the surface of the object that fell into the ocean when the object exploded, after it was exposed to the immense heat of the fireball that surrounded it as a result of its friction on entry. We went there, and amazingly we found 750 molten droplets, called spherules, even though the ocean was a mile deep. The region that the Defense Department localized for the meteor site was about seven miles in size. It was really a very difficult task to look for those molten droplets that are smaller than a millimeter, a grain of sand, at the bottom of the ocean across seven miles.

In Papua New Guinea?
About 60 miles from Manus Island in Papua New Guinea. Amazingly, we used a sled that had magnets on both sides, and the idea was to drag it on the ocean floor and collect any magnetic particles. We had 26 runs. Then we'd bring the magnetic sled to the deck of the ship and scrape the magnet for any materials and dry up the sample and put it under a microscope and find those molten droplets.

What has analysis of the spherules revealed?
I brought the materials back to Harvard, to my colleague Stein Jacobsen, world-renowned geochemist, who has one of the best mass spectrometers in the world and an imager. We also collaborated with Roald Tagle at the Bruker Corporation, Berlin, Germany. We had a preliminary report, that included analysis of 10% of the spherules. We found spherules that are concentrated along the meteor path. They were of a special kind in terms of their composition. Such a composition was never seen before because it includes enhancement of some rare elements, like for example, beryllium, lanthanum, uranium, that are hundreds of times more abundant in those spherules than in solar system materials—the standard composition of the building blocks of the solar system.

We gave these special spherules a name, because they were never seen before in the scientific literature. So we called them "BeLaU," which represents these three elements, beryllium, lanthanum, uranium. There are 60 elements from the periodic table that we looked at; we can conclusively say it's not terrestrial coal ash. It looks as if it's from outside the solar system because its composition is not found on Earth, on the moon, on Mars or asteroids.

Now we are currently in the process of going through the entire sample and finishing the analysis. Hopefully soon we'll update the preliminary report.

Have you ever personally encountered an extraterrestrial being and/or UAP?
No, but this is really my main goal. I really want to learn, and I believe we're probably not the smartest since the Big Bang. I want to figure it out and find if there's a partner out there that we can learn from. I want to know the answer during my short life. If I ever have an encounter with a higher intelligence, the first question I'll ask is, "What happened before the Big Bang?" A very advanced scientific civilization may be a good approximation to God. My second question would be, "Where is the nearest bar where we can hang out?" Just like in our private life, if we find a partner, it would give a meaning to our existence.

What are the chances that such partners exist out there?
Very high. To find a partner, you really need to leave home. It's really about collecting and seeking evidence. It will not fall into our lap. We really need to put in the effort to find out if we have partners out there.

The U.S. government can save me a lot of time. Life is short. I just want to know the answer—if the government knows the answer, and it's not human-made objects, if they have that kind of evidence, they should release it to scientists like myself. Because it's knowledge that should be shared by all humans. If we discover technologies from far away, that could inspire us.

We put lots of money into conflicts. There are two wars going on. Trillions are spent every year on military budgets worldwide. If we were to spend the same amount of money with different priorities, we could send a CubeSat toward every star in the Milky Way galaxy in this century.

IZZY LUSH

ANAL! ANAL! ANAL!

PHOTOGRAPHY BY LARRY FLYNT PRODUCTIONS

Even before I entered the XXX industry, I was a huge fan of porn. I was obsessed with it, watched it all the time, and I just knew that it was the career for me. When I decided to take the plunge, I reached out to a ton of people in the business until I got my foot in the door. Since then, I've met so many great performers and, of course, had a ton of hot sex. I love it—especially the anal scenes. I'm an anal fiend, so the more dick I get in my butt, the better."

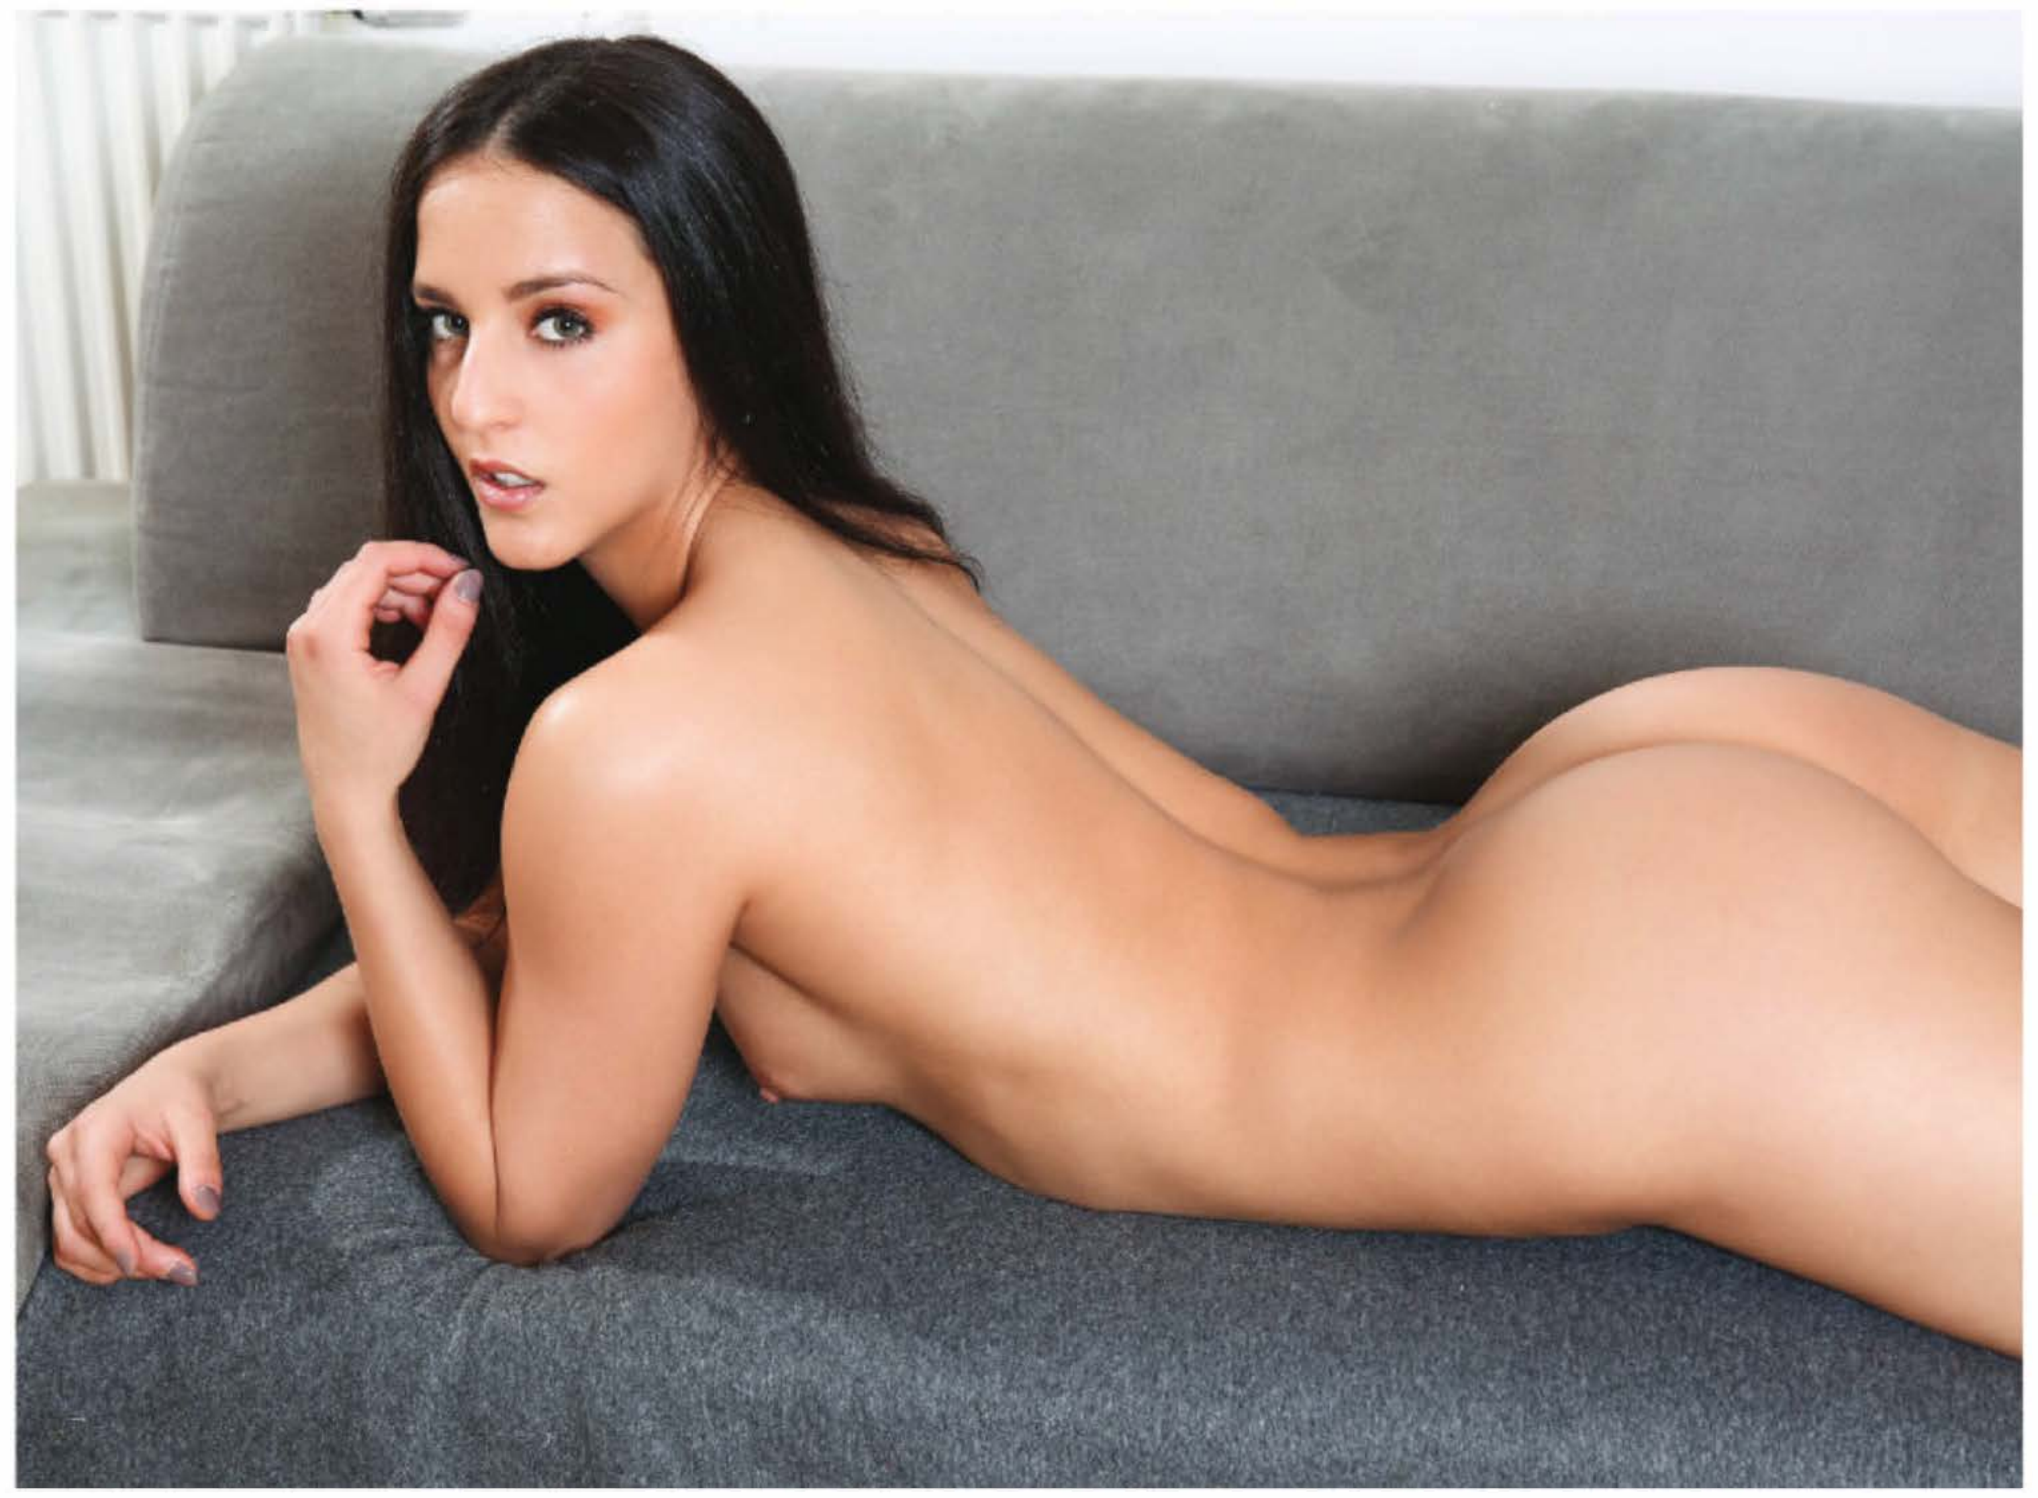
BEAVER HUNT®

EDITED BY MORGEN "TEX" HAGEN



BETZZ

"Men get horny looking at naked women, and I love arousing them," says Betzz, 21, a XXX video vixen and former ballerina from Prague, Czechia. "Girls from my country are beautiful, sweet and skillful in the boudoir. That's why men around the world are so fond of us." The 5-foot-6 Eurodoll would make dandy eye candy donning a tutu and pink ballet slippers, but she's even more breathtaking in the altogether. "I would describe myself as bisexual with a preference for cock, and two are always better than one," Betzz lays on us. "I am energetic, capricious and seductive. When I see it, I want it! And I am very flexible, so I love to be fucked in all sorts of contorted positions that are a far cry from ballet's croisé derrière, écarté and épaulé. I also have a special talent: I can give a footjob and a blowjob at the same time. How's that for a nutcracker?!"

—Photos by Omnia Productions

"My fantasy is being the prima ballerina in The Nutcracker, and all the female dancers are nude."

Happy Birthday!

For a bonus eye candy interlude, we've rounded up five former Beavers who'll be blowing out birthday candles in May. Caramel is a "very bubbly, witty and assertive" stripper from Pulaski, Missouri. "I feel that nudity is a form of art through expression," she professes. Ariel Ganja—a Nevada-based legal courtesan out of Kansas City, Missouri—says, "I've always had an oral fixation, and I've been told time and again that I have a knack for fellatio." Harley Lane from San Antonio, Texas, was working at a Nevada legal bordello when she came our way. "I'm always caring, spunky and fun to be around," she maintains. Blunt Bunny from Houston, Texas, recalls, "I once had sex in a Starbucks bathroom while Black Friday shopping. I'm open-minded and spontaneous." Finally, Kitty Quinn—a cam model from Miami, Florida—"felt like a princess" when she garnered the 2021 Beaver of the Year crown. Happy birthday, ladies!

"My birthday wish is a gangbang with ten or more men."

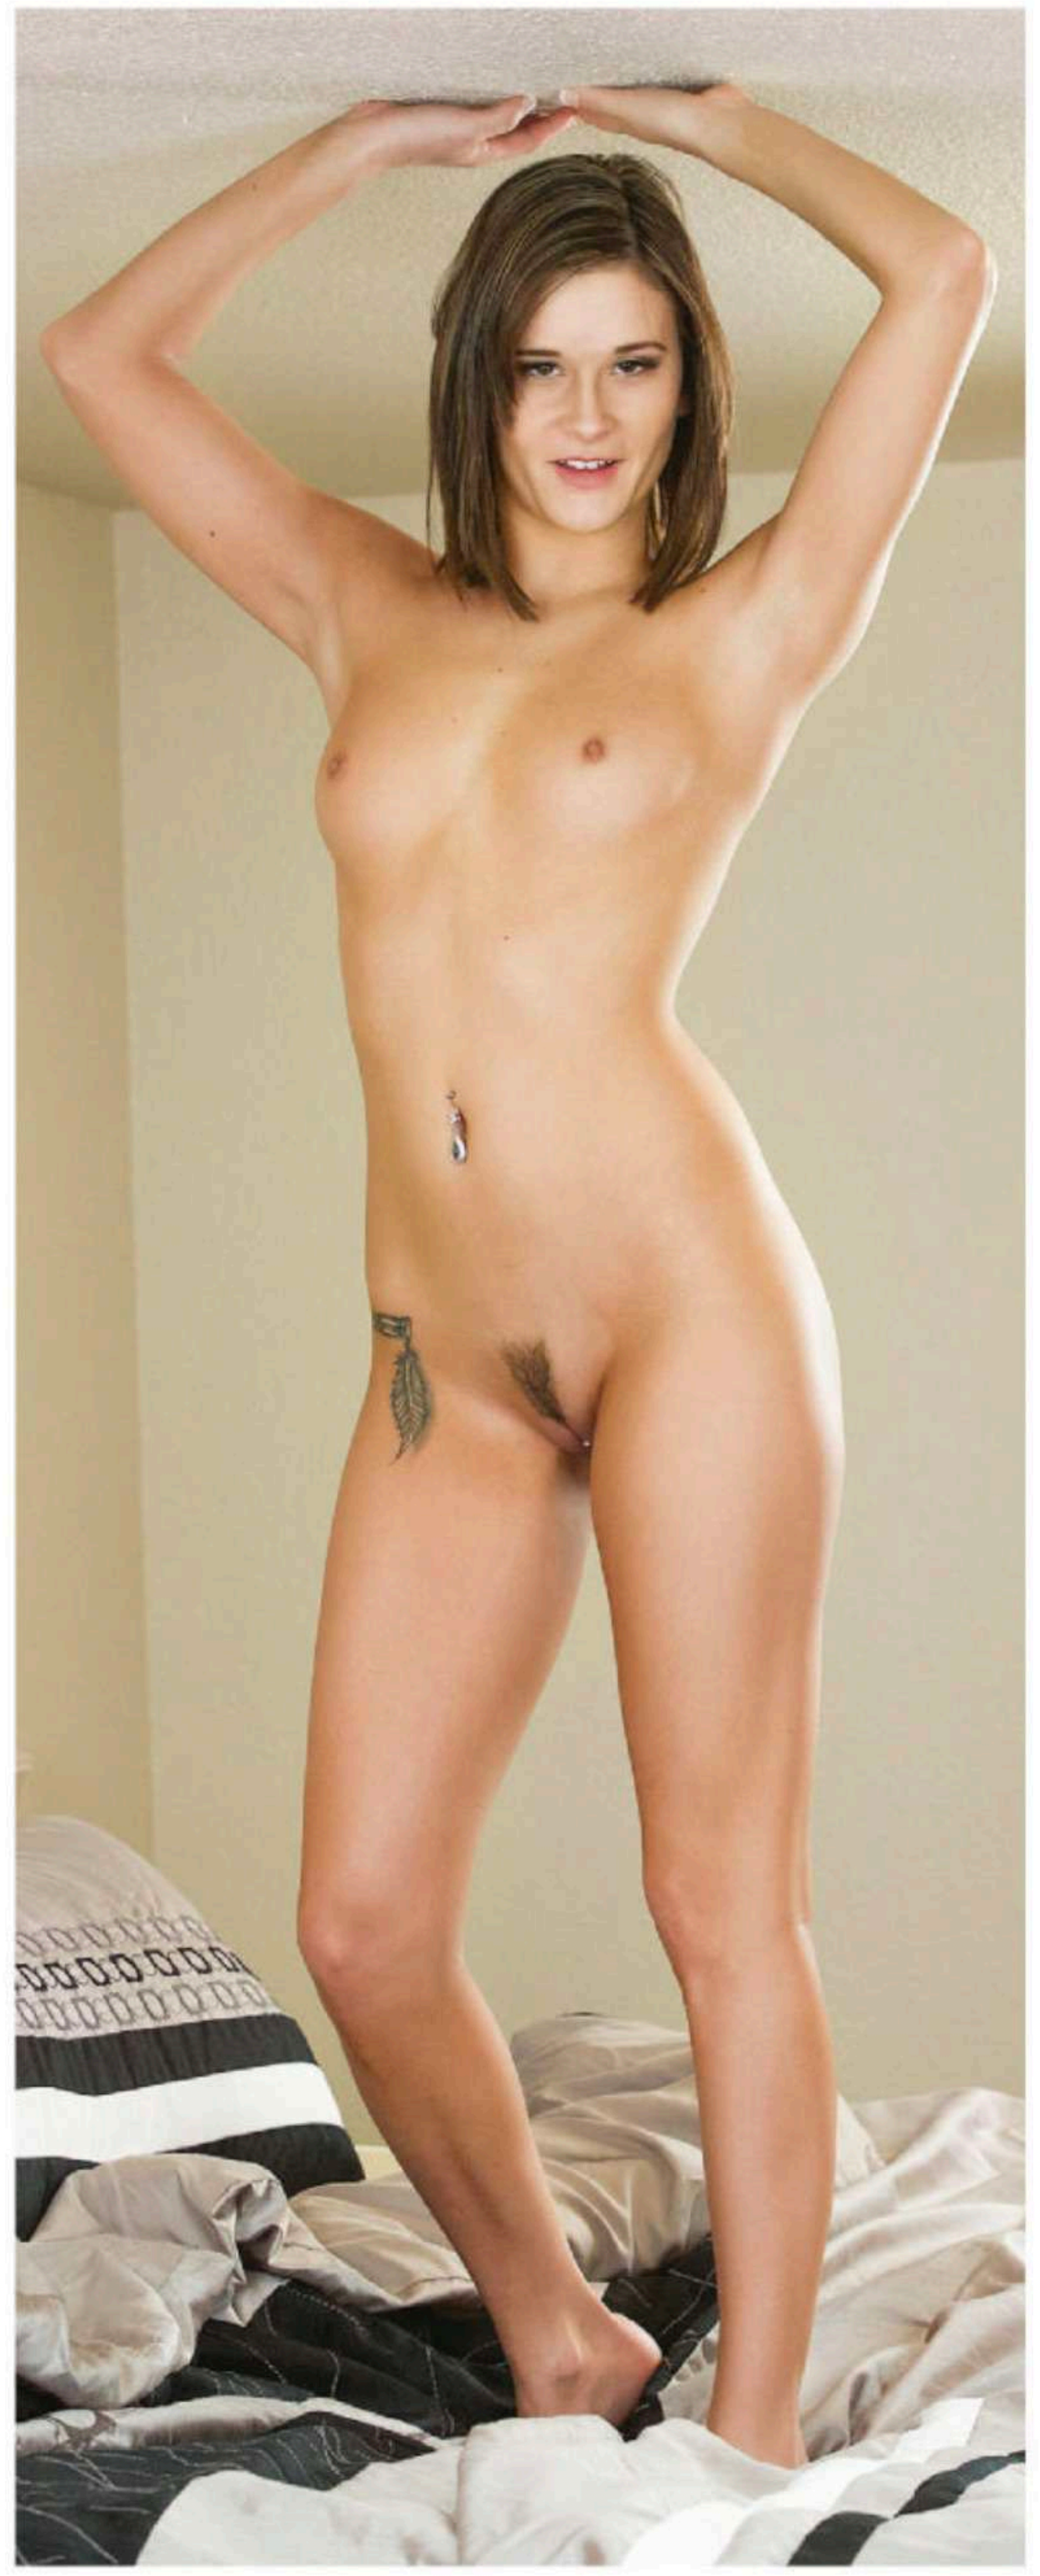
ARIEL GANJA



HARLEY LANE

BLUNT BUNNY

"I'm a mischievous little minx always looking for my next pleasurable adventure. I'm silly, assertive, motivated and very, very naughty. I love modeling nude because that's when I feel most beautiful and, most importantly, free."

KITTY QUINN

BRODY JEAN

"I am unapologetically me and always in trouble," admits Brody Jean, 35, a pediatric nurse, mom and online model from Boerne, Texas. "I am wild and crazy, but also a sweetheart and nurturer." The 5-foot-2 Lone Star Stater goes on to tell us, "I am up for doing anything outside, especially snowboarding and wakesurfing. I also enjoy painting and playing video games. My favorite is Call of Duty." Brody Jean is definitely into performing amorous duties: "I am a fan of doggy-style," she says, "and I love it when my man uses some toys and puts me in restraints. As an alpha female, I will always be his queen. I may kneel before you, I assure him, but I will never be beneath you." Brody Jean, whose hijinks include "putting a waterproof sheet down and squirting all over my guy after we fuck," has a pair of fantasies: "I want to get a sex slave to please my man, and then he and I double-team her. I appreciate women a lot. I'd also love to have a 50 Shades of Grey dungeon in my house so I can be really, really submissive and be punished every day!"

"How wild and crazy am I? One day, while driving down a highway at 70 miles per hour in a hot rod, I climbed on top of my man and fucked him."
